RAD Photo Essay: RAD in New Bern, North Carolina

"My first thought was, 'I hope they make it better than it is.' And they did." - Barbara Sampson, Resident

Craven Terrace, which is in a quaint historic district of New Bern, North Carolina, underwent a RAD conversion that was completed in March 2018. Now residents are not only enjoying modernized apartments, but they are also reveling in the community's rebirth. One of the buildings now offers meeting space for the resident coordinators and the resident council, as well as such critical services as art classes, literacy programs, access to computers, a food bank, and a trauma care center. Read more about the transformation and the new focus on the well-being and growth of the residents here.

- The RAD Team

The RAD Photo Essays series documents the resident experience for properties that go through a RAD conversion. The purpose of RAD is to preserve and improve affordable housing so that residents can live in stable, healthy, and safe environments. This series highlights the quality-of-life impact of RAD on people. After all, the success of RAD isn't measured in dollars but in people.
