5. BITS & PIECES: Tribal News

Hand Washing Stations for the Navajo Nation

As we continue to battle the spread of the Novel Coronavirus, communities have grown increasingly aware of the importance of hand washing to prevent the spread of illness. Residents with indoor plumbing can readily wash their hands thoroughly and often, however residents without are left finding other means to maintain personal hygiene and prevent the spread of COVID-19. For the Navajo Nation, the disparity in running water access was highlighted by the Navajo Water Protect. According to the project, Navajo are 67 time more likely than other Americans to live without running water or a toilet. Among other challenges, these sanitary deficiencies hinder the Navajo Nation's ability to fight the spread of infection. In May, the Navajo Nation reached the highest rate of infection per capita than any other U.S. state. Since then groups have been working to bring running water to the Nation. Among them, the donationdependent group WATERED, Water Acquisition Team for Every Resident & Every Diné, was founded to purchase hand-washing stations for families in need. Deliveries for these stations began in June. The Red Feather Development Group has taken a different approach by building

DIY hand-washing stations using 32-gallon trash bins, PVC piping, and a foot pump. They teach community members how to build their own stations at workshops on the Navajo and Hopi reservations. While these hand washing stations are only a temporary fix to long-term infrastructure needs, they offer an immediate and innovative approach to provide limited running water and mitigate the spread of COVID-19 for many families in need.

September: National Preparedness Month

September marks National Preparedness Month, a time for communities, families, and utilities to understand and prepare for natural or man-made disasters. At the utility level, countless disasters must be planned for by assessing vulnerabilities and developing response plans that ensures potential damages are mitigated or prevented. This includes natural disasters such as drought, flooding, hurricanes, wildfires, winter weather, algal blooms and more. We must also prepare for main breaks, power outages, cyber attacks, theft, vandalism, source water contamination, and other potential threats. Altogether, there's a lot of emergency preparedness a small system has to take into consideration and luckily we're here to help. On our website you can find a variety of blogs that will assist you in your emergency planning under the tag Emergency Response. We discuss everything from cyber-security to wildfires to compliance with the America's Water Infrastructure Act (AWIA). These blogs often reference free online resources you can use to improve your emergency planning however you can use our resource library to search documents and online tools on your own. Remember that emergency preparedness isn't just about writing an emergency response plan and having it sit on a filing cabinet until your incident comes to fruition. Utilities should regularly review their protocols and practice response. This can involve hosting a table top exercise in coordination with local agencies that might be involved in your response. During these exercises consider how your system might communicate with the public during these emergencies.
