Know Your Marketplace Leverage
It is often presumed through urban policy suggestions and case studies that a good idea or policy can be replicated almost anywhere. Of course some ideas such as bike lanes and trails are applicable in many locations, but this is not always the case. In this article, the author contends that one reason for this problem is that many policy ideas seldom take into account the amount of marketplace leverage a particular place has. Understanding the level of marketplace leverage a city has is critical to evaluating local policies where the results could affect competitive positioning. San Antonio Focuses on Brainpower and Collective Impact to Improve its Economy
Municipal and community leaders understand that education is a driving force behind economic development. Serving as a model to other cities, San Antonio is focusing on education to develop and harness skilled talent to improve its economy. For this reason, San Antonio served as host to the National League of Cities’ Mayors’ Education Policy Advisors Network’s (EPAN) 2014 Annual Meeting. At the meeting, advisors from across the country discussed different ways education can serve to reconcile the economic and academic achievement gaps, as well as explore education as a means to ameliorate poverty and foster citywide collaborations. Denver Housing Authority Initiative Joins “Target Cities” in New Era of Urban Leadership
The City of Denver and the Housing Authority of the City and County of Denver (DHA) recently announced its participation in Target Cities, a two-year partnership of nine development projects across seven North American cities designed to amplify and accelerate district-scale community regeneration and create replicable models for next-generation urban revitalization. EcoDistricts – the Portland, Oregon, nonprofit behind Target Cities – announced the partnership as a commitment at CGI America, a program of the Clinton Global Initiative.

The vision for Denver is to transform the entire 100 acre Sun Valley neighborhood and create a district entity that will oversee and carry on the operation of the created district for years to come. As a Target Cities project, the Sun Valley Transformation Initiative will incorporate the central principles behind the EcoDistricts Protocol, which guides the projects through district organization and governance, assessment, implementation, and monitoring. FUNDING OPPORTUNITIES

Social Innovation Fund Pay for Success Grants Competition
The Corporation for National and Community Service is pleased to announce the launch of the Social Innovation Fund Pay for Success Grant Competition. Pay for Success is an approach that partners private, public, and nonprofit sectors by aligning payments for social services with verified social outcomes.

The Social Innovation Fund is about finding solutions that work and making them work for more people. The Pay for Success competition takes this mission to the next level — ensuring proven solutions have the dollars needed to scale, while cities and states with tightening budgets focus on solutions that work and only pay for results. The competition will provide $11.2 million in grants to help cities, states and nonprofits develop Pay for Success projects, where governments pay service providers only when there are demonstrated results. The funds specifically provide grants for intermediary organizations to help determine feasibility, build capacity, or structure Pay for Success transactions.

Applicants are encouraged to send a letter of intent by July 15, 2014 and applications are due by July 31, 2014 at 5 p.m. EST. Visit the website to learn more about Pay For Success.

The Overwhelming Persistence of Neighborhood Poverty
There are few issues among urban policy academics as contentious as gentrification. Despite all the public debate around the subject, urban poverty remains profound and concentrated. According to a new study from Joseph Cortright of the economic consulting firm Impresa and Portland State doctoral student Dillon Mahmoudi, high-poverty areas rarely transform with any real dramatic reductions in poverty rates. The study compared neighborhood-level poverty rates in the country’s 51 largest metro areas in 1970 and 2010, focusing on changes in the Census tracts within a 10 mile radius around the urban core. The study found that deep-rooted poverty was just about the most consistent thing among these neighborhoods and only a small fraction of neighborhoods had turned around in a way that could be called gentrification. Milwaukee Neighborhoods Make Progress through BNCP, Despite Challenges
This article describes how the Building Neighborhood Capacity Program (BNCP) has fostered resident engagement and community building in two Milwaukee neighborhoods. Metcalfe Park and Amani are among eight neighborhoods in four U.S. cities chosen to receive technical assistance aimed at catalyzing community-driven change. Leaders of the program in both neighborhoods acknowledge that the work is slow and difficult, but say they have made progress. Both communities have seen an uptick in resident engagement and improved relationships with the Milwaukee Police Department, the lead agency in the federal grant. Further, both are working on ways to engage young people in their neighborhoods in positive activities that will promote their growth into healthy adults.

7 Cities Where Poor Neighborhoods Bucked the Trend and Became Wealthier
Since 1980, the nation’s poorest neighborhoods have remained mostly unchanged while high-income areas have seen a healthy amount of growth. The Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland has new research exploring the stagnant growth in pockets of concentrated poverty and why it still persists. While most poor neighborhoods have remained stuck in poverty, there are some cities that have been able to buck this trend. This article addresses the question of why some low-income neighborhoods have seen growth while others see very little. Read more about the research provided by the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland, here. To read the article, click here.

Will This Be the Decade of Big City Growth?
For the first third of this decade, big city population growth continues to outpace the rates of 2000 through 2010, according to new data released by the Census Bureau. It raises the question, is this city growth revival here to stay? Or, is it a lingering symptom of the recession, mortgage meltdown and the plight of still-stuck-in-place young adults? The new statistics, which update city populations through July 2013, give some credence to both theories. To read more click here.
